Western Balkan Integration and the EU: An Agenda for Trade and Growth (Directions in Development)

Though Western Balkan countries have enjoyed respectable growth rates over the past five years, they now face a shifting international and domestic environment. Trade preferences are eroding, export competition is increasing, and the easier phase of post-transition growth is waning. In order to reduce still-high poverty rates and work toward EU accession, Western Balkan countries need to improve--and then sustain--their economic growth performance.

'Western Balkan Integration and the EU' examines topics related to current account imbalances, export patterns, regional integration in goods and provision of services, labor costs, the investment climate, and foreign direct investment. It suggests that countries in the region could reap sustained growth payoffs and enhance EU access prospects by deepening regional integration, improving human capital, reducing telecommunication costs, and pre-empting energy shortages.

Aimed at an audience of economic and social policy makers and social scientists in Western Balkan countries as well as international organizations, the book complements World Bank activities at the country and regional levels and will feed into countries' dialogues with development partners, particularly the European Commission.
